

Title: Language Access and Domestic Violence During COVID Against Latin American Women

Corresponding Author: Ashley Marte, server, respond crisis translation

"Make sure to include the impact of COVID-19 in the experimental methods mentioned. While COVID's impact was briefly mentioned in the introduction, the paper is primarily focused on language access and how that affects survivors of domestic violence."

"The abstract describes a study that would examine the intersecting issues of language access, language justice and domestic violence among Latin American women in New York State. The results from the proposed study could contribute to an understanding of whether COVID increased the incidence of domestic violence (and why), and how non profit organizations offering services for women experiencing domestic violence can continue their services despite the impact of COVID on operations. On both dimensions, the role of language accessibility is of central importance. The principal investigator, as stated in the abstract, has many years of experience as a translator. This expertise will be critical to the success of the proposed study. Some components of the study are not specified- including whether agreement to participate in the study has been obtained from any of the proposed 15 nonprofit organizations. Include what other details you can from the study/proposed study to provide an update, if possible."
