"The author(s) should pay particular attention to editing throughout the manuscript. Typos and sentence structure issues make following the links between online education, Black youth, and mental health outcomes relatable. One of the fatal flaws in argument is treating all Black youth as experiencing a monolithic existence in school. Another fatal flaw is racial labeling. Choose "African American" or "Black" – and remain consistent, the terms are not interchangeable. Find balance in the argument as to why readers should find the research on online education interesting and scientifically important. The abstract needs to expand upon the study's importance within the existing scientific literature. Some of the text contains underdeveloped arguments that do not link to data resulting from the literature, federal or state report, or original data. Consider adding some statistical data from educational or criminal justice data sources. The notion of culture needs to be discussed."
